Roman Baths and Temple of Sulis Minerva in the 1st Century AD

In the 1st century AD the Baths and Temple of Sulis were at their greatest extent. In the courtyards there was space for hundreds of visitors, and the complex was filled with activity. The baths were staffed by temple priests, and slaves were all present.

Captain Francis Austen Undress Naval Uniform

Here we see Jane's brother Francis resplendent in his naval uniform of 1803.

The shirt is made of good quality linen with a close fitting high collar and cuffs. The cuffs at the neck are made from fine grade linen. The neck stock has been copied from an original worn by Nelson. It is made from silk tulle and loosely pleated into a stiffened bucking band.

The cotton stockings are an original pair of slightly finer cotton Victorian stockings stained at the back. For 1815 prices, stockings continued to be made in the same way as those of the early 18th Century.

The shoes are handmade from leather and are 'straight laced', meaning they are not made with a left and right foot, as today. Wearing the shoes over time established which shoe was which for the wearer.

The undress coat is made from a very fine melton duckin wool, manufactured by the world renowned, Brindley Hensworth company who have been supplying uniform cloth since the early 18th Century. It is possible that they supplied the material for Francis' original 1803 uniform.

Francis Austen was one of Jane's two brothers who chose the Royal Navy as a profession when Britain was at the height of its naval power during the 18th century. Francis and his younger brother Charles would both enter the Royal Naval Academy at Portsmouth in the 1780s. Francis was the first of the two to be promoted to the rank of Captain, and Charles to the rank of Admiral of the Fleet.

The uniform and coat are replicas created by hand and are made by the Austen family of Portsmouth.
